

Donald Cox

Donald Cox is a dedicated educator and proud alumnus of the University of Redlands, where he earned his Bachelor of Arts in Political Science in 2001. Building upon his undergraduate foundation, he completed his Teaching Credential in 2003 and later advanced his educational expertise by obtaining a master's degree in Curriculum and Instruction in 2007. Currently, Donald is pursuing his doctoral studies as a candidate in the School of Education at Liberty University.

With 23 years of experience in secondary education, Donald has established himself as a committed high school social studies teacher, bringing depth and passion to his instruction while inspiring countless students to engage with history, government, and civic responsibility. His extensive classroom experience spans over two decades, during which he demonstrated unwavering dedication to academic excellence and student development.

Beyond his teaching responsibilities, Donald maintains strong ties to his alma mater through active service on the University of Redlands Alumni Board of Directors, where he is currently serving his third year. In this capacity, he contributes to the university's ongoing mission while helping to strengthen connections between the institution and its graduates.

A lifelong resident of Redlands, Donald combines his deep roots in the community with his professional expertise to make lasting contributions to both local education and his university. His commitment to continuous learning, evidenced by his current doctoral pursuits, reflects his dedication to educational excellence and his desire to positively impact the field of education.
